Similar but different?: assessing the reserve economy legacy of Namibia (Pankhurst, Donna) – This paper argues that in policy thinking on rural development in Namibia, there has been a tendency to draw on a particular, somewhat distorted, history of the countryside. Recently, more accurate analyses of different localities are being generated by Namibianist historians, but such research ought to be located not only within a country framework, but also within a comparative history of Namibia and her southern African neighbours. In initiating the latter task, this paper uses the issues raised in W. Beinart's 1984 paper on soil erosion, conservationism and ideas about development to compare Rhodesia (Zimbabwe), South Africa and Namibia. It shows that Namibia's agrarian colonial history has had a significant bearing on the legacy of State policies towards the countryside, and on the present nature of rural social and economic relations. There are similarities in the analysis of environmental problems in Namibia and in other countries. However, the contrasts in terms of actual policy thinking about conservation leave Namibia as an exception to the thesis that there is commonality in the experience of handling environmental problems. Drought and survival in rural Namibia (Devereux, Stephen & Naeraa, Trine): This paper examines the impact of the 1992/1993 drought on three vulnerable socioeconomic groups in Namibia: smallholder crop farmers, livestock rearers and commercial farmworkers. A modified entitlement framework is adopted: as well as examining entitlement-generating strategies (including credit), the paper also considers 'indirect' entitlement-protecting strategies, such as dietary change, consumption rationing and demographic adjustments at the household level. Although Namibia did not experience a decline in aggregate food availability during the drought, hunger and malnutrition did affect certain groups who suffered 'direct entitlement declines' (crop farmers), 'trade entitlement declines' (livestock rearers) or 'derived destitution' (farmworkers), and were unable to secure adequate food through alternative sources such as extended family support, credit or food aid. Namibia's experience confirms the dangers of supply-side analyses of food security. When the composition of a country's food supply changes dramatically, there are likely to be some groups whose food security is negatively affected because they cannot be guaranteed access to available food, even when supplies are sufficient in aggregate terms. The paper is based on fieldwork data gathered during the crisis. (Notes, ref.)
