Dilemmas of development: burley tobacco, the environment and economic growth in Malawi (Richard J. Tobin & Walter I. Knausenberger) – Efforts to encourage smallholder farmers in Malawi to produce tobacco for export illustrate the dilemmas that developing nations and donor organizations face when their quest for development entails compelling economic incentives but potentially harmful impacts on human health and environment. USAID began tobacco-related efforts in Malawi in late 1991, with the initiation of a seven-year Agricultural Sector Assistance Programme (ASAP). This article examines the rationale for choosing tobacco as a vehicle for economic development in Malawi and then addresses the problems of designing an effective environmental monitoring programme. Smallholder production of burley tobacco might affect the soil, the quality and quantity of water, and the forests. The Malawian government committed itself to develop what is now known as the Malawi Environmental Monitoring Programme (MEMP) when it agreed to accept the grant funds associated with ASAP. The aim of MEMP is to identify and mitigate the environmental impacts of ASAP's policy reforms. (Ref.)
