Identity and political consciousness in southern Mozambique, 1930-1974: two Presbyterian biographies contextualised (Teresa Cruz e. Silva) – The Swiss Mission's work, particularly in the field of education, contributed to the reshaping of identity and political consciousness in southern Mozambique. Through its programme of formal education, by promoting access to secondary and university education and by preparing an African leadership for the church, the Swiss Mission helped to form an educated elite and inadvertently contributed to the emergence of a nationalist leadership. This article focuses on the biographies of Sebastiao Mabote (born in 1941) and Lina Magaia (born in 1945), two nationalist leaders who grew up as members of the Presbyterian Church, joined Frelimo and assumed an important role in Mozambican politics and society after independence. The first part of the article provides a background on the work of the Swiss Mission in Mozambique and its relation to the colonial State. The Mission came to provide a religious and educational environment which was permissive (at the very least) of anticolonial sentiment and organization long before the 1950s. It survived in a hostile colonial environment, responding through diverse strategies to successive acts of repression. Against this background, the second part analyses the social biographies of Lina Magaia and Sebastiao Mabote. (Notes, ref.)
