Clear waters and muddied histories : environmental history and the politics of community in Zimbabwe's Eastern Highlands (Donald S. Moore) – This article provides an ethnographic grounding to environmental politics by examining struggles over the demarcation, implementation and multiple meanings of the proposed Kaerezi River Protected Area, bordering the Nyanga National Park, in Zimbabwe's Eastern Highlands. Since independence, State administrators, white sport fishermen, resettlement farmers and 'traditional' authorities have all sought to influence the fate of the ecologically sensitive river corridor. Competing cultural constructions of the landscape itself – a rainmaking territory, a chieftainship, a former colonial ranch and a resettlement scheme – have figured prominently in postcolonial conservation politics. Cultural politics – debates over the meaning and practice of 'custom' and 'tradition' as well as legitimate authority – are foregrounded to demonstrate the simultaneity of symbolic and material struggles over resources. Based on field research in Nyanga District, conducted from 1990 to 1992. (Notes, ref.)

Landscapes, fields and soils: understanding the history of soil fertility management in southern Zimbabwe (Ian Scoones) – Many commentators on African agriculture believe soil fertility is declining to levels where food production can no longer be sustained, thus spelling disaster for the future. But how accurate are these doomsday pictures? This paper examines the issues of soil fertility management using a case study from Chivi and Mazvihwa communal areas, southern Zimbabwe, where field research was carried out between 1985 and 1988, and since 1990. An historical perspective (covering the period 1850s up to the present) is taken which attempts to unravel the range of factors which have influenced the changes in soil fertility at landscape and farm levels over the past century. The story that emerges is not one of terminal decline, but one where some areas have increased in fertility status through active enrichment through management, while others have declined. The role of institutions, both local and external, in mediating the processes of soil fertility change is highlighted through an examination of the patterns of labour organization, land tenure, government legislation and markets and prices. The resulting story is much more complex than the simplistic commentaries so often dominating environmental and agricultural policy debates. The implications of this complexity for planning and policy are briefly discussed. (Notes, ref.)

Modernity and ethnicity in a frontier society : understanding difference in northwestern Zimbabwe (Jocelyn Alexander, Jocelyn & JoAnn McGregor) – In the aftermath of the white settler defeat of King Lobengula's Ndebele State in 1893, the Shangani Reserve was created in the remote north west of Zimbabwe as a homeland for 'the Ndebele'. This article builds on Terence Ranger's pioneering work on Ndebele identity through an exploration of the everyday politics of naming as it occurred in the context of forced evictions of many thousands of Africans from 'European' farms in the Matabeleland heartland into the Shangani in the 1940s and 1950s. The authors argue that day-to-day interactions were critical in shaping the content of Ndebele identity. Evictees, whose communities and structures of leadership were systematically broken up by an administration intent on suppressing political activism, were nonetheless the principal agents in this process. They defined themselves as modern and Ndebele, and sought to establish their superiority over communities they encountered in the Shangani by asserting the moral weight of a civilizing mission, and drawing on notions of hierarchy drawn from the 19th-century Ndebele State. The colonial transformation of precolonial identities took the form of reinscribing old names with new significance. These names, though often dating from the 19th century and often 'tribal' in origin, conveyed ideas about status associated with 20th century notions of modernity and primitiveness. (Notes, ref.)

'The government must not dictate': rural-urban migrants' perceptions of Zimbabwe's land resettlement programme (Deborah Potts & Chris Mutambirwa) – Since its inception in 1980 Zimbabwe's land resettlement programme has been marked by very varied performance and keen debate. In the 1990s analyses of the programme by both supporters and critics of land reform have generally been negative. This article examines how a sample of rural -urban migrants explained their perceptions of the programme and how their feelings compare with the rather negative academic assessments and contemporary debates. The article reports on research from 1994 amongst migrants who had come to live in Harare since 1990. The sample included 268 adult migrants, randomly selected from Harare's high-density areas (Kuwadzana, Mbare, Glen Norah and Highfields). Nearly four-fifths of the interviewees expressed a positive opinion about resettlement. Positive aspects mentioned included the quantity or quality of land made available, and the quantity and quality of crops that could be grown on the schemes. Matters of justice and equity were deemed far more important than economic criteria and respondents also expressed a strong attachment to the concept that land rights should come without preconditions. Government insistence on commercially oriented production was perceived as unwarranted interference. (Bibliogr., notes)

State, peasantry and resettlement in Zimbabwe (Jocelyn Alexander) – The end of minority rule in Zimbabwe in 1980 seemed to herald dramatic changes in agrarian and local government policies, as well as in official attitudes towards the rural areas more generally: the newly elected ZANU(PF) government promised a dramatic decentralization and democratization of government structures and a large-scale redistribution of land. This article assesses the extent to which the promises of independence were met. It stresses the importance of the political context of debates over agrarian change – the constraints of a negotiated independence, the political clout of commercial farmers, the ruling party's own political agenda and economic interests – and focuses on change in the institutional forums in which debate took place, particularly the extent to which the inherited ideologies and practices of the State bureaucracies charged with formulating and implementing agrarian policies were transformed by decentralization and majority rule.
