Clear waters and muddied histories : environmental history and the politics of community in Zimbabwe's Eastern Highlands (Donald S. Moore) – This article provides an ethnographic grounding to environmental politics by examining struggles over the demarcation, implementation and multiple meanings of the proposed Kaerezi River Protected Area, bordering the Nyanga National Park, in Zimbabwe's Eastern Highlands. Since independence, State administrators, white sport fishermen, resettlement farmers and 'traditional' authorities have all sought to influence the fate of the ecologically sensitive river corridor. Competing cultural constructions of the landscape itself – a rainmaking territory, a chieftainship, a former colonial ranch and a resettlement scheme – have figured prominently in postcolonial conservation politics. Cultural politics – debates over the meaning and practice of 'custom' and 'tradition' as well as legitimate authority – are foregrounded to demonstrate the simultaneity of symbolic and material struggles over resources. Based on field research in Nyanga District, conducted from 1990 to 1992. (Notes, ref.)

The environmental challenge to the nation-State: superparks and national parks policy in Zimbabwe (Rosaleen Duffy) – The transnational nature of environmental problems has highlighted the need for cooperation between nation-States. In southern Africa the field of wildlife conservation has already witnessed a growth in multinational conservation schemes. The Trans Border Conservation Area or 'superpark' which incorporates parts of Zimbabwe, Mozambique and South Africa is a good example. While the ecological and economic basis of the superpark has been agreed, political factors have slowed its implementation. This article explores the superpark proposal within Zimbabwe, and analyses why the Zimbabwean State has proved to be less enthusiastic than its partners. In particular, it examines the internal disagreements in the ruling ZANU -PF party and in the Parks Department which have proved to be significant stumbling blocks for wildlife conservation. The troubled history of the area covered by the superpark, including the impact of military forces from the three partner States and poaching operations in the 1980s, are factors that have impacted on the Zimbabwean State's willingness to cede control to a transnational park authority. In addition, the government views the superpark as a loss of sovereignty and as a means of diverting funds from the Treasury to private business and local communities. (Notes, ref.)
