Men, migration, and households in Botswana : an exploration of connections over time and space (Nicholas Townsend) – Much previous research in Botswana on the situation of mothers of young children and their relationship with the fathers has started from the situation of individual women and has used residential households as units of analysis. In order to penetrate beyond the isolated residential household, the present author investigated the links between residential groups and noncoresident individuals during fieldwork conducted in the village of Mmankgodi, south Botswana, from April 1993 through January 1994 . In contrast to most research on domestic life, he started from the life experiences of men. He considers men's life histories, and, through tables , shows men's connections to households, their marital status and their place of residence by age in 1973 and 1993. The conclusion is that extending investigation beyond the residential household reveals links between men and children to whom they are related in a variety of ways. Men may be related to household heads, and to children in households, as sons, brothers, sons-in-law, maternal uncles, biological and social fathers, cousins, and grandfathers. (Notes, ref.)
