Subject terms: * Southern Africa * South Africa * democracy * political participation * Namibia * Botswana * elites

Abstract:

In many African countries, the possibilities for democratisation are being strongly opposed at almost every turn by authoritarian and corrupt tendencies emanating from inherited institutions and from within new ruling elites. Individual competition, and the otherwise passive voter choosing periodically between competing elites, typify liberalism, and oppose participatory or popular democratic forms. This volume focuses on changing social structure and forces, such as new working classes, civil societies, and ruling and competing elites, in the three liberal democracies of Botswana, Namibia and South Africa. It concentrates in particular on those institutions which favour or oppose the achievement of accountable, open, and ethical government. The book seeks to interpret the important distinctions that exist between Botswana and its neighbours. The author argues that, even though the south is the most democratic region in Africa, this does not obscure the severe limitations of the liberal model, and the need to establish other and broader definitions of democracy.

Abstract:

Botswana presents a paradox. There are parts of the country where "poverty is endemic and for many, livelihoods have suffered to the extent that some are supported only by state destitute payments. It is the only country of 21 in the world that recorded a drop in the human development index (HDI) during the period 1990-2001 and simultaneously experienced rapid economic growth.

Using environmental accounts to promote sustainable development : experience in southern Africa / Rashid Hassan, ... [et al.]. - Oxford : Blackwell Publishers, 2003 (Feb.). - 12 p. : tab., ill. ; A4

Includes notes and references.

Location: SA 2003-02-00

Subject terms: * Southern Africa * environmental effects * environmental policy * sustainable development * economy* * natural resources * Botswana * Namibia * South Africa

Abstract:

Environmental accounts bring together economic and environmental information in a common framework to measure the contribution of the environment to the economy and the impact of the economy on the environment. They enable governments to set priorities, monitor economic policies more precisely, enact more effective environmental regulations and resource management strategies, and design more efficient market instruments for environmental policies. This article uses examples from the regional environmental accounting programme in southern Africa to demonstrate the usefulness of environmental accounts to policy-making and natural resource management. The examples address the contribution of natural capital endowments (minerals and fisheries) to sustainable development in Botswana and Namibia; the economic importance of non-market forest goods and services in South Africa; and the socio-economic impact of current water allocation and pricing policies in Botswana, Namibia and South Africa. While there are many additional policy applications, these few provide a powerful argument for the use of environmental accounts in all countries. [publisher's text]

Subject terms:

* Botswana * immigration * migration policy * migrants * refugees * opinion surveys * rights of aliens

Abstract:

For the last two decades, Botswana has had the reputation as a "country of immigration," based on the large-scale import of skilled expatriates from Africa, Asia and the West. This policy has been accompanied by a general acceptance, and even openness, on the part of Batswana towards non-citizens. In the late 1990s, however, these attitudes began to change, with intolerance towards non-citizens growing in a country where it was unknown only a few years earlier. Against this background, the University of Botswana mounted the SAMP National Immigration Policy Survey (NIPS) in Botswana in 2001. This survey delved into two basic areas: (a) citizen perceptions of immigrants, migrants and refugees groups and (b) attitudes towards Botswana's own national immigration policy.

Defending Democracy: A global survey of foreign policy trends 1992-2002.

Includes notes.

Location: BW 2003-01-00

Subject terms: * Botswana * democracy * international political relations * country profiles

Abstract:

Botswana's overall record of support for democratic governance abroad is good, particularly within the southern African sub-region. Since its independence in 1966, Botswana's sound governance, peaceful transitions of power, and well-regarded political leaders have given the country domestic credibility and stability. This internal strength, which has contributed to Botswana's image internationally as Africa's longest continuous multiparty democracy, has enabled it to speak out against anti-democratic violations abroad and to engage in effective conflict management during constitutional crises in other countries. The country's strong democratic record also makes up for a lack of geopolitical clout and military might, and allows Botswana to assume a leadership role on the continent that belies its small size. Botswana's support for international democracy has been relatively consistent since 1992, with successive administrations becoming somewhat more willing to involve themselves at the diplomatic level in ongoing controversies and democratic challenges. To some extent, this trend has tracked changes in world political opinion, which has increasingly favored the policing of gross infractions of democracy and human rights in other countries, and retreated from strict interpretations of the principles of self-determination and of "non-interference" in the internal affairs of states.

Abstract:

This case study provides a general synopsis of processes of public-private sector dialogue in Botswana. It traces the evolution of current structures, describes how they function and lists what are deemed to be strengths and weaknesses. Further, it highlights the role of the main private-sector representative body and finally presents a list of lessons learned. The findings are based primarily on a set of interviews with private-sector and government representatives involved in public-private dialogue. A list of persons met is provided in the appendix. The appendix also presents a list of background documents that were consulted for this report.

Multi-party democracy in Botswana / ed. by Mpho G. Molomo, Brian T. Mokopakgosi. - Zimbabwe, Harare : SAPES Books, 1991. - 63 p. : tab. ; 21 cm. - (State and democracy series / SARIPS)

Includes bibliography, indexes and notes.

Location: BW 15.5-1991-01

ISBN 0-7974-0951-3

Subject terms: * Botswana * multi-party politics * democracy * gender discrimination * elections * electoral system * political participation

Abstract:

This collection of seven essays unravels the intricacies of the political process in Botswana, a country long regarded as a 'beacon' of the multiparty democratic system. It shows, however, that Botswana's multiparty system is incapable of facilitating real political participation by the mass of the electorate because of, inter alia, the historical dominance of the ruling Botswana Democratic Party (BDP), a generalised lack of education, the traditional discrimination against women, and economic backwardness. Contents: Introduction

(Brian T. Mokopakgosi and Mpho G. Molomo); Political parties and democracy in Botswana (Patrick P. Molutsi); Botswana's political process (Mpho G. Molomo); How free and fair? (Bojosi Otlhogile); The political economy of Botswana: implications for democracy (Patrick P. Molutsi); The electoral process (Ranwedzi Nengwekhulu); Election, democracy and hegemony in Botswana (Balefi Tsie); Women and politics (Motsei Madisa).

Monetary independence for Namibia / ed. by Charles Harvey, Jan Isaksen. - Namibia, Windhoek : NEPRU, 1990?. - 122 p. ; 21 cm. - (NEPRU publications; No.1)

Includes ann. and notes.

Location: NA 09.1-1990-01

Subject terms: * monetary policy * Namibia * Swaziland * Lesotho * Botswana * currency

Abstract:

This volume is the report of a workshop on Monetary Independence for Namibia held on 23 April, 1990. It was organized by the Namibian Economic Policy Research Unit (NEPRU) and the Ministry of Finance. The impetus for the workshop was the plan of newly independent Namibia to introduce its own national currency, the Namibian dollar, and it wanted to learn from the experiences and mistakes of its neighbours in their pursuit of the same goal. The papers contained in the book are the opening speech which was delivered by the Minister of Finance, Otto Herrigel, Monetary policy within the framework of the Common Monetary Area: the case of Lesotho by A.M. Maruping, Monetary policy in Swaziland: possible lessons for Namibia by Brian Oliver, Establishing a central bank: Botswana's experience by Quill Hermans, Towards monetary independence for Namibia by Wijetunga M. Tilakaratna, Issues raised in questions to the main speakers by Charles Harvey, Closing remarks by Otto Herrigel, and a general summary of the main conclusions by Charles Harvey.

Includes bibliography and index.

Location: BW 15.8-1989-01

ISBN 81-202-0258-9

Subject terms: * Botswana * economy* * social-economic conditions * social-economic policy * multi-party politics * international economic dependence * South Africa

Abstract:

Botswana has received praises for its impressive and sustained economic growth, its stability, and its multiparty democracy. In the present book the authors critically examine Botswana's economic development and multiparty system, and the basis and foundations of the much praised stability. They argue that the rosy economic picture of Botswana masks massive poverty in the rural areas and growing unemployment. Other challenges to Botswana's stability are the growing violence and instability in the region and the country's dependence on South Africa. The development process is totally in the hands of the bureaucracy, and this makes the articulation of discontent by opposition parties difficult, if not impossible. In fact, Botswana is an administrative State rather than a multiparty State. The decisive factor in maintaining stability will be the availability of finances to buy off discontented elements among the elite or to provide handouts for the starving masses. [ASC abstract]
