Subject terms: * HIV/AIDS * transnational corporations * Botswana * South Africa * health and safety * private sector * health policy * SADC

Abstract:

South African multinational companies play an important role in the economies of the Southern African region, and what they are doing about the issue of HIV/AIDS both at home and in other countries is important for the implementation of the SADC Code on HIV/AIDS and Employment. This study compares the South African and Botswana national policy frameworks on HIV/AIDS in general, and specifically in the field of employment, and looks at how they were developed. It then presents the results of a study of HIV/AIDS initiatives amongst 33 South African multinationals, 33 Botswana subsidiaries of such companies, and 34 Botswana national companies. The findings give a measure of the current state of private sector interventions in the two countries, and compares those of the South African multinationals with the Botswana subsidiaries and the Botswana domestic companies. The report highlights shortcomings in the approaches of all three groups, but also shows that South African initiatives by multinationals are not crossing the border into Botswana, so that their subsidiaries, and especially domestic Botswana companies are being left behind in the fight against HIV/AIDS, to the detriment of Botswana employees and their families and communities. This comparative study assesses the readiness and ability of six African countries - Botswana, Lesotho, Mozambique, South Africa, Swaziland and Zimbabwe - to respond to the HIV/Aids epidemic. The key issues addressed are: Is the allocation to health, as a per cent of total government expenditure, sufficient? Is enough allocated to deal with HIV/Aids, given the magnitude of the problem?

Abstract:

Crucial to an understanding of regional dynamics in southern Africa is the enormous asymmetry between South Africa and the neighbouring States. In what ways have South Africa's relations with southern Africa altered since the changes of 1990 and the first democratic election in 1994? This volume addresses this question. The contributions are arranged into three main sections. Section 1 deals with the politics of disengagement and re-engagement and contains chapters on military transitions in southern Africa (Susan Willett), small arms proliferation in postapartheid South and southern Africa (Alex Vines), war, peace and conservation in southern Africa (Eddie Koch), and South Africa's foreign policy (Greg Mills). Section 2 focuses on the changing geographies of production and economic integration, with chapters on South Africa's relationship with Zimbabwe (Colin Stoneman), Walvis Bay's reintegration into Namibia (David Simon), the sugar industry in southern Africa (Steve Atkins & Alan Terry), South Africa and the southern African power pool (Tore Horvei), and the SADC, Comesa (Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa) and SACU (Southern African Customs Union) (James D. Sidaway & Richard Gibb). The final section contains contributions on population and mobility: regional migration to South Africa (Sally Peberdy), female migration in and from Botswana (Kavita Datta), and HIV/AIDS in southern Africa (Douglas Webb). The introduction and conclusion are by David Simon.
